

Oldfield: Up to his old

By KEN VELOSKEY

He wore scanty trunks, mesh T-shirts and puffed cigarettes without shame as the whirl of events played on around him at the 1972 Olympiad in Munich. A stodgy, starched collar, conservative Olympic Committee shook their heads in disgust.

Scribes from such prestigious journals as Sports Illustrated and Time labeled him behemoth, humongus, a colossus and a loudmouth.

He's South Elgin's own Brian Oldfield.

Oldfield literally turned the art of shot putting around. His discus like release for the 16 pound orb, like himself unconventional, produced a record which some feel (including Brian) will not be broken.

But like Roger Maris' record breaking home run feat, there is an asterisk after Oldfield's mark set at Bowie High School in El Paso Tex. on May 10, 1975.

Oldfield's 6-5, 275 pound frame heaved the shot 75 feet. A record toss that still stands but he did it under the guise of a professional athlete.

The amateur associations refuse to recognize the effort in their books. "I'm like the Dr. Perry of sports medicine, said Oldfield. "He's a chiropractor, not AMA oriented, it's the catch 22 baby."

"You might say I have been disenfranchised," said Oldfield while tossing a shot like a golf ball at Larkin High School Tuesday afternoon.

It's been a little over four years since the flamboyant giant released that record toss.

Standir
of the sho
is four ye much into

"I ma
track wh
paying it.
pro trac
would be there is n

Yet wh
Associati
its savin
was the g

August 17, 1979

ld unconventional ways

Standing in the familiar territory of the shot put ring Tuesday, Oldfield is four years older (34) and still very much into being Brian Olfield.

"I made enough money in pro track where I would have trouble paying it back," he said. "There is no pro track and field movement, it would be difficult to carry because there is no new amateur blood."

Yet while the International Track Association was alive, Oldfield was its saving grace, the showcase. He was the good copy.

And he still keeps in touch with his 'club'. "Shot putters keep close," said Brian rattling off names of former ITA members. "The club is going to get together soon, and talk over times."

Oldfield was making a short stop at home via Toronto, Ont. Canada, where he was doing such things as caiber tossing and bailing hay with pitchforks.

He'll be in the Chicago area for of an exhibition on Aug. 19 at the University of Chicago's new all weather track. Brian does those things now and participates in Scottish game events.

Gone are the days of outsprinting women less than half his weight and size for 40 yards in television's Superstars program and topping O.J. Simpson in weight lifting. He calls the San Jose, Calif. area home now and dabbles in real estate. He has not lived in the Elgin area for any length of time since 1973.

Brien however still feels a long,

Please turn to page A25

Brian Oldfield

Continued from page A26

long way from being washed up as an athlete.

He is quick to point to the case of Al Oerter. For years Oerter was the supreme being of the discus throw. He retired, but returned to competition and according to Oldfield, at age 42 is tossing the discus better than he ever did.

"You're not washed up after 30," said Oldfield. "Your body can become more efficient.

Oldfield is still efficient and his torso is almost impeccable. There are men Oldfield's age wandering around who would give up a month's worth of beer to appear half as formidable.

He still feels he could make the dollars like Bruce Jenner. "He endorses boxtops, and ABC gave him a real big hype," said Oldfield.

But then Oldfield starts using words like disenfranchised. He is also a bit philosophical about recapturing the limelight.

"I don't blame anybody for not following me out on a limb after I sawed it off," he said with a sigh.

Oldfield, like the song, has done things his way. The former Illinois State High School shot put champ still stands alone unswerved by his outspoken demeanor.

"Even when I was in third grade I had trouble being eligable for things," recounted Oldfield. "When it came time to make the trip to the museum, the teacher said Oldfield you're not eligable."

The 1963 Elgin High School graduate is still holding his own and doing rather well.

"When they just left me alone, I did alright."